MR. STANLEY AS MEDICINE MAN.

I met the chief at the gate of my camp, and bowing profoundly, invited him to my tent, which I had arranged as well as my circumstances would permit, for his reception. My Persian carpet and bear skin were spread out, and a broad piece of brown red cloth covered my炕床, or bedstead.

The chief, a tall robust man, and his children, were invited to seat themselves. They sat at a look of such gratified surprise at myself, at my face, my clothes, and guns, as is almost impossible to describe. They looked at me intently for a few seconds, and then each other, which ended in an uncontrollable burst of laughter, and repeated snappings of the fingers. They spoke the Khasi language, and my interpreter Magawa was requested to inform the chief of the great delight I felt in seeing them. After a short period, expended in interchanging compliments, and a competitive excellence at laughing at one another, their chief desired me to show him my guns. The "sixteen-shooter," the Winchester rifle, elicited a thousand flattering observations from the excited men; they could hardly restrain those hearty and workmanlike they thought were superfluous, evoked such gratified eloquence that I was fain to try something else. The double-barrelled guns fired with heavy charges of powder, caused them to jump up in affected alarm, and then to subside to their seats convulsed with laughter. As the enthusiasm of my guests increased, they asked each other's index finger, as to whether the chief pulled as they until I feared they would end in their dissolution. After having explained to them the difference between white men and Arabs, I pulled out my medicine chest, which evoked another burst of rapturous sighs at the cunning neatness of the array of vials. He asked what they meant.

"Dows," I replied sentimentally, a word which may be interpreted—medicine. "Oh, oh," they murmured admiringly. I succeeded, before long, in winning unqualified admiration, and my superiority, compared to the best of the Arabs they had seen, was but too evident. "Dows, dows," they added.

"Here," said I, uncorking a vial of medicinal brandy, "is the Khasi powder (white man's beer); take a spoonful and try it." At the time they were drinking, I succeeded, before long, in winning unqualified admiration, and my superiority, compared to the best of the Arabs they had seen, was but too evident. "Dows, dows," they added.
